

the question of allowing the sale of Liquor, the speaker declined to give his opinion; that being a matter resting entirely with Gen. Slough, who, of right alone had discretionary power, and who could not be expected to please all, there being a considerable difference of opinion on the subject in regard to the matter. The speaker again reverted to the charge of exclusiveness preferred by Mr. Miner, and said that he, Miner, had been elected to the Wheeling Legislature; called attention to the number of office holders here, not Virginians, but said it was natural that persons born in Virginia should be proud of the State that had given birth to Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Marshall, Clay, Harrison and Scott, "Great God!" exclaimed the speaker, "do you blame people for being proud of her?"

Capt. Van Reyper desired to know of Mr. Massey whether he had not prior to the Secession of Virginia, stated that "as his State went, so he would go?"

Mr. Massey—It is a lie. He had said under great excitement when interrogated by Mr. S. Blacklock, that if the State seceded, "he would either have to remain here or go away," and he had told his family that they must prepare to leave even if reduced to beggary.

Capt. Van Reyper said he had it from good authority.

Mr. Massey—No sir, your authority is not good. If your author was here, and heard me, he not only lies, but he knows he lies.

Capt. Van Reyper said he had only made the remark in order to give Mr. Massey an opportunity to justify himself.

Mr. Massey: "of course." He then proceeded to quote the speech of Henry Clay in the Senate of the U. S. "that he owed his allegiance first, to the government and then to the State of Kentucky," as embodying his views. He again repeated that the movement of the Reform party was aimed at the Military and not at the Civil authorities, when

Mr. Miner protested that such was not his understanding, as he had always been, and was still, on the most friendly terms with Gen. Slough.

Mr. Massey said that the Reform party had undertaken a beautiful strategy. They thought that inasmuch as they had nothing, at present, all the officers they could elect would be a clear gain, and that therefore they had nominated only three new candidates; a Mayor, a Superintendent of Police—a gentleman of whom he knew nothing, except that the people of Alexandria were indebted to him for the revival of several of the Olympic Games, he having run and lost a foot race, a short time since, he believed—and a Chief Engineer of the Fire Department. The people of Alexandria were too old in politics, not to understand the trick, which would certainly be unsuccessful, do what the Reformers might.

Capt. Van Reyper asserted that the whole Reform Ticket would be elected.

Mr. Massey said that the Captain had no vote; that it would be time enough after he had a vote to undertake to influence the elections; and he thought it strange that people who had not been here long enough to be warm in their beds, should be aspiring to positions which ought to be occupied by those having real interest in the affairs of the city.—

He said that the liquor dealers had gone to work the wrong way, to procure permission to sell. They had used all kinds of means to undermine Gen. Slough, but had invariably been foiled, and it was like shooting a pocket pistol against a mountain. Gen. Slough acted conscientiously, and he believed for the good of the city. The speaker concluded by urging the re-election of all the present incumbents, in office, stating that they were capable and efficient.

At the conclusion of this speech he offered a series of resolutions endorsing the past acts of the Federal Administration and its future endeavors to "suppress the rebellion," declaring perfect faith and confidence in Abraham Lincoln, and expressing a preference for his re-election as President; appealing to the "loyal people" to lend their aid "to Gov. Pierpont in his endeavors to bring back Virginia to her allegiance to the U. S. Government;" impressing upon all voters the necessity of attending the polls and casting their vote at the ensuing election, and urging an organization in every county and town in the State, held by the Federal troops. His resolutions were put and unanimously adopted—and the meeting was declared adjourned;

When three cheers for the "Reform" ticket was given by a portion of the meeting.
